

Aidan was a true friend. Kind-hearted, genuine, trustworthy, loyal and an all round nice guy. I can see why we became friends in the first place.

Aidan & I got to go through a lot together looking back now, historic moments in life like attending a new school in Brisbane, graduating high school, schoolies, 18th's & 21st's, enrolling in university, getting bored with university, dropping out of university, & more recently the honour of being his best man.

We enjoyed getting into mischief every now and then, I remember one time Aidan, Josh & myself walking around my old suburb changing a few street signs to say ANUS DRIVE, we thought it was quite clever of ourselves, I don't regret it though, makes for a good story sometimes. That was a great summer; we spent the entire summer making a movie together for school. We were proud of this project that we were working on together for ages, it won an award and stuff, but we recently got around to watching it and boy was it crap, a lot worse then I remember it being. I guess it was just the enjoyment of just mucking about with mates. Good Times.

In the end it's the little things that were the best, like getting lost driving around Brisbane just listening to jack Johnson, or headed to a park to play some night Frisbee or hitting golf balls into the Brisbane river in summer.

I suppose Aidans made an impact on us all in some way over the short time he was with us, he's taught me a thing or two over the year and I hope I taught him a few things too. I wish him well on his peaceful journey now, and that he watches out for us.

We love you...
